A Fistful of Thorns Michael A. Crane

It's 1880 and Arizona Territorial mining and cattle interests have secretly hired the guns of Doc Holliday to protect their financial interests from the murderous Cow Boy criminal enterprise.

The Cow Boys, in league with Cochise County Democrats and Sheriff John Behan, have a death grip on Territorial politics. Pima, and later Cochise, County is described in newspapers of the day as a "condensation of wickedness and evil."

Tombstone is a Republican island of law and order in a virtual sea of Democrat crime and corruption while the gangsters are being tacitly facilitated by Republican Governor John C. Fremont.

Also, by secret protocol, Doc has agreed to act as a "lightning rod" to deflect any potential gun play away from Wyatt Earp, the Sheriff designee of newly formed Cochise County, thereby keeping him (Earp) alive and free of any public criticism that would certainly surround a shootout.

Backing up Doc will be some of the most lethal personalities ever gathered on the American frontier. The "deadly dentist" as Doc has become known, is also aided by his equally as lethal and volcanic mistress, Kate Elder, as well as members of the Mexican Secret Service--the Brevi--which has its own reasons for bringing down the Cow Boy organization and capture of the treacherous Mexican, Spider Arana, who has been leading Cow Boy raids into Mexico against the Hacendados--Mexican cattle barons. A Fistful of Thorns is their story.

Of his friend, Doc Holliday, Wyatt Earp will later say, "There was nothing in his soul but iron."
